CRAZY?

This short tale was written more than 300 years ago in Spanish. I have translated it and made just a few changes:

In a small town there lived a young fellow who decided that he didn't want to work. He would let others take care of him. So he got a very big stick. And he would go around the town in a most threatening manner. The older folks came to a very simple conclusion: He was crazy! In Spanish the word is loco. The women felt so sorry for him. So each day he would go to another house and be fed.

"You must be kind to him," said one woman. "He is a most unfortunate young man."

The older men gave him cast-off clothing to wear. Nobody would dare to make fun about him. Because he would swing his big stick at them. Even the children were careful not to do anything to offend him. So life was thus easy for him. One day a stranger came to town and stopped at the local inn. He was a nice looking youth. The innkeeper warned him.

"Be careful when you go to the plaza. There is a crazy youth with a stick. He might hurt you."

"Just give me a stick twice the thickness of his," grinned the youth." And I will take good care of him.

This youth, armed with that stick, went to the plaza. As soon as he saw the other fellow he chased him with his stick. In turn, that fellow dropped his stick and ran looking for the officer of the law. When he found him he shouted:

"Help! There's another crazy fellow in this town!"

The Winner

It was the annual meeting and contest of the Fishermen's Liar Club. From all over the country they had come to tell their fishing fibs. The old timer got up to tell his. The prize was a gold plated fishing reel. He opened a box and took out a silver loving cup.

"Tell you folks how I won this cup. It was in a race I hadn't entered. I was fishing outside the channel in Bar Spring Harbor. Didn't even know that they were holding a free-for-all boat race. Any kind of a boat was elegible. You could use any kind of power to move your boat. No limitations. There were sail boats; outboard motor boats; even row boats; and some powered by jet motors. Yes, sir, anything went that day.

So there I was fishing for a big one. And suddenly I hooked into him. At that moment they fired the starter's cannon. I figured it was that noise that scared the fish. He wanted to get away from it all. So like mad he swims right into the channel. Now mind you, I got a very strong line. He pulls my boat. We are going so fast, we leave all the other boats behind. And when I cross the finishing line, I am first. And just then, my line broke. So that is how I got this silver loving cup."

The president of the Fishermen's Liar Club listened to the round of applause that greeted this tale. Looked like a winner.

"Anyone can top that tale?" he asked.

"I don't know whether I can beat it," grinned another old timer. "But every word he says is true. I was the judge who gave him that silver loving cup."

P.S.: He got the gold plated fishing reel.

The Prediction

He was one of the four greatest astronomers in the world. He taught in a famous European University. It was his first trip to the United States. He was going to give a series of lectures on Astronomy in this country. And then help prepare a special TV program in Astronomy. So you can see he was a busy man.

He was invited to see the largest observatory in this country. Six newspaper reporters were in the party. He did look like a very modest man. They went to the platform where he could stand and peep into the eyepiece of this special telescope. No directions were given to him on how to operate. Since he had helped to design it.

His right eye was close to the eyepiece and there was a very serious expression on his face. He then announced to those around him what he had just learned.

"It is going to rain in this area this evening. A heavy rainstorm. So I would like to get back to my quarters."

Four other professors used the same telescope. And each came to the same conclusion: There was nothing to be seen that could indicate rain. One reporter went to the phone and called the weather bureau. They told him their report; No rain this evening.

You guessed it. It poured and poured that evening. The reputation of the great astronomer was still 100%. In the morning, that reporter spotted the great man alone and spoke to him.

"We were all wrong. Including the weather bureau. You were so certain in your prediction. And correct. How did you do it?"

"When my corns ache that way, I know it is going to rain very heavy," was the explanation.
